

English Composition 1 with Workshop

Instructor: Myra Thomas

Presentation:

"Defining Moments: Teaching Vocabulary in an Engaging Manner"

Introduction

For instructors of English Composition 1 with Workshop, the students come to the class in need of additional help in many areas. But before we can get to the point of writing a very rudimentary essay or breaking down a brief nonfiction story, the students need to have a basic understanding of vocabulary.

1. Words in Reading

Without a good command of the English language, it is impossible for the students to read well. Many of the difficulties in reading the essays in Fields of Reading happen, not only because the students do not like to read or don't read often enough, it is because many of them are truly struggling with the definition of words we assume they should know by their age.

2. Words in Student Essays

Without a decent vocabulary, they simply cannot produce a college-level paper. As instructors, I know we often read papers with syntax problems. Proper syntax is very much determined by the interplay of words, so instructors need to emphasize vocabulary in the community college setting.

Additionally, there are students who will get in the habit of using "BIG" words, trying to write what they think is a college paper. Many of these attempts with "big words" fail. The students will misuse words or mix-up unrelated words.

3. Best Practices

A. The Dreaded Vocab List

I give a vocabulary assessment. They are advised that it will not be held against them. But, it gives me an idea of the words they do not know. The quizzes are made up of words pulled from Kaplan's SAT review words and other words I pull from the essays we will read in Fields of Reading. From that, I build a vocabulary list for the students. They are required to find the definitions on their own. At this point, the students need motivation. I give pop vocabulary quizzes. If they do well, they can earn extra credit points on an essay.
