Gene-environment Interplay for Well-being ,2023 Well being is a phenotype that is increasingly recognized as both an important research topic across several disciplines e g psychology sociology economics as well as a public policy goal The term well being itself is an umbrella term that is used to describe a multitude of constructs including but not exclusive to happiness subjective well being and psychological well being Based on former research we have learned that individual differences in well being phenotypes are caused partly by genetic factors and partly by environmental factors In this thesis I aim to unite genetic and environmental research on well being by studying how they dynamically combine and contribute to well being In the first section of this thesis I start with a re evaluation of the relationship between different well being measures and well being genetics Next in the second section I present data driven approaches to studying environmental correlates of well being and use the outcomes of these studies to examine potential gene environment correlation the phenomenon where exposure to the environment depends on one s genotype In section three I study influence of genetic and environmental factors on well being and self rated health during an extreme environmental shift that took place during the writing of this thesis the COVID 19 pandemic Lastly in section four I move from correlational approaches to causal approaches In this last section we focus on socioenvironmental influences on adolescent well being and on the potentially causal effect of longer education on several well being and health outcomes All in all the work presented in this thesis presents us with novel insights on gene environment interplay for well being that help us understand well being better and may be used to guide further research and policy
